About This Test

A Fatigue Panel is a collection of diagnostic tests designed to identify the underlying causes of chronic tiredness or fatigue. Fatigue can be caused by a wide range of factors, including nutritional deficiencies, hormonal imbalances, infections, autoimmune diseases, and chronic health conditions. This panel of tests helps doctors pinpoint the specific cause and tailor appropriate treatment plans. Common tests included in a Fatigue Panel may involve checking for anemia (via Complete Blood Count or CBC), which can lead to feelings of tiredness due to low red blood cell count. Thyroid function tests (such as TSH, T3, and T4 levels) are crucial, as hypothyroidism can often cause fatigue. Vitamin and mineral levels (such as Vitamin B12, Vitamin D, and iron) are also measured, as deficiencies in these can result in low energy levels. Tests for autoimmune diseases, like Antinuclear Antibody (ANA) or C-reactive Protein (CRP), help identify conditions that can cause inflammation and fatigue, such as lupus or rheumatoid arthritis. Additionally, blood sugar tests (like fasting glucose or HbA1c) help rule out diabetes as a potential cause. By combining these tests, a Fatigue Panel provides a comprehensive view of potential health issues contributing to fatigue, enabling doctors to develop a targeted treatment plan.
